Will Bolivia's centrist government respect existing hydrocarbons and lithium agreements?

LA PAZ, Jan 19 (Reuters) - Bolivia's centrist government will respect all existing hydrocarbons and lithium agreements as part of a push to rebuild investor confidence after years of instability, the country's energy minister said in an interview.

Does YPFB still control energy trading in Bolivia?

Bolivia's state-owned energy firm, YPFB, which controls energy trading, will remain part of the system but no longer dominate it, Medinaceli said. The reform, due to be presented in the first half of this year, is designed to lure private firms back into exploration through a more flexible tax and royalty system and new contract models, he said.

Why is Bolivia drafting a new oil and gas law?

"Now we must find a way to move forward within the framework of the signed contract." OIL AND GAS OVERHAUL Bolivia is drafting a sweeping hydrocarbons law and a separate lithium law to attract foreign capital after nationalization of strategic industries under the previous leftist administration hurt output over roughly a decade.
